As poachers turned gamekeepers, the Manchu emperors resolved that never again should the thunder of hooves on the steppes threaten to simplify the complex societies of Eurasia. In 1727 they divided central Asia between themselves and the Russians. But there was more to the fall of the middle Asians than that: the steppes experienced frequent droughts in the Little Ice Age, and oceanic trade routes diminished the value of the Central Asian roads. India was not at first excluded in the carve-up, but by AD 1765 the British gained control of Bengal, their doorway to the subcontinent
